

Emotion Focused Therapy (EFT) – for individuals

Masterclass Emotion-Focused Therapy for Generalized Anxiety Disorder

Facilitated By Jeanne Watson
October 6, 2017

Introduction

Generalized Anxiety Disorder (GAD) is known as a persistent disorder which often does not respond well to therapy and often re-occurs. It is also apparent that diagnoses are being missed or clients are wrongly diagnosed as being depressed or having a personality disorder. GAD symptoms are: a consistent presence of anxiety and fear, together with deep feelings of shame and desperation, which cause constant worrying and severe physical suffering. Eventually this causes total exhaustion and depression.

EFT is an integrative therapy approach that brings together interventions and concepts from humanistic, experiential, gestalt, and interpersonal theory and practice to work more effectively with clients. It has been found to be effective in the treatment of a number of different disorders including depression, trauma, anxiety and couples.

Emotion Focused Therapy is particularly suited to address maladaptive 'emotion schemes', which are at the root of a generalized anxiety disorder, and to help clients to bring about a positive and lasting change and combat this distressing problem.

Workshop content

In this workshop the role of EFT in promoting clients' emotional processing and affect regulation in the treatment of Generalized Anxiety (GAD) will be presented.

The etiology of GAD and case formulation using EFT will be introduced along with different processing markers to guide specific treatment interventions and enhance the development of the therapeutic alliance. Working with clients to resolve negative life experiences and develop positive ways of being with self and other is an essential to the healing process. The workshop will demonstrate how to work with worry in GAD as well as how to work with clients to change their negative relationships with self. The use of two chair tasks to develop self-compassion and self-soothing will be presented. The use of empty chair work to promote clients' differentiation and self-assertion will be discussed. Participants will learn how to differentiate specific in-session processes that occur with clients with GAD and how to work with these to promote change and resolution.

Participants will learn how EFT therapists attune to clients' emotional experience moment to moment in the session using verbal and non-verbal markers of clients' cognitive-affective states. They will learn how to work with worry-splits, enhance the development of clients' self-soothing, and facilitate the development of clients' self-assertion to overcome GAD. Specific interventions and ways of working with clients' emotional pain will be reviewed and illustrated with case vignettes.

The day will consist of a combination of theory and skill practice in small groups.

The day is targeted at psychologists and psychiatrist working in Mental Health. To attend this course you will need to have followed EFT level I. It is preferred that you are familiar with the client centered methods. (think of experiential therapies or focusing)
